Title

LightScripts

Summary

The Surround Light system comprises multiple lamps or fixtures that are used to extend the experience of watching a movie, listening to music or playing a game into the domain of lighting ambiance and effects.

An issue however is where descriptions of the light settings and effects that are to be used to enhance the media consumption experience are generated and stored. Another issue is how to make sure that the light settings are synchronised with the media playback.

The invention proposes the use of light scripts that contain (1) a description of the light setting or effect, (2) a description of the changes of each light setting or effect over time and (3) the start time & end time of each light setting or effect including their dynamics.

For example:

Time code Fade in time Fade out time Light 1 ... Light N

5634.456 40.000 20.500 12,30,30 ... 20,45,45

5935.490 01.000 00.500 80,80,80 ... 80,80,80

In the above example the light setting is described per light source, but it could also be named, with the settings per light source for each light setting described in a second script or file, or even generated automatically. For example:

Time code Fade in time Fade out time Setting

5634.456 40.000 20.500 Cosy01

5634.456 40.000 20.500 Flash

And the second file:

Setting Light 1 ... Light N

Cosy01 12,30,30 ... 20,45,45

Flash 80,80,80 ... 80,80,80

In this way the light script can be distributed over multiple files.

The lightscript or lightscript files can reside in various locations:

- on the medium that also contains the AV-content (CD, DVD, CD ROM, ...)
- on a remote location (for example on an internet server), in this case the scripts will be read from this remote location
- on a local storage medium (HDD or memory), it can be copied from the AV-content carrier, downloaded from a remote location, or generated by the system before and stored locally
- the light script is generated by the system by means of signal analysis/feature extraction, in this case (parts of) the script reside(s) temporally in the system (HDD or memory). But the generated script can also be stored for future use.

The lightscript can furthermore be stored in multiple ways:

- it can be stored as a single file which comprises the light settings as well as the timecodes
- it can be stored as multiple small files, each describing one light settings, these files are read out synchronously with the playback of the AV content
- the script can be stored in a serial manner as a light track that is read out synchronously with the media (audio/video) output (much like the Dolby audio information for film).
- a combination of the above (multiple light script files read out one by one as the media output continues).
